League shop at Birmingham and one day when I went in the shop there was much excitement. Several women were in a huddle over a "lady doll" someone had bought from New York with a complete trouseau. I heard them say the party who made the clothes wouldn't make any more for twice the party who made the shop would like to stock the dolls if clothes could be had. (I was just aching to get my hands on that doll and some pretty materials.) I voint tecred to take the doll home and try my hand. (I had thought to myself that I could make prettine doll clothes than I ever had, with such an adorable subject.) I promptly returned the doll and clothes to the shop and was 'snow ed under' with orders.

STRICT ECONOMY MONTGOMERY, Ala.-Cheere by thousands who thronged the streets of this historic Capital City under bright January skies, Ala bama's new governor, Frank Dixon, a Birmingham lawyer and son of a Baptist minister, saw a spectacle in his honor that had mor of a military flavor than any other held in the State since World War days.

A decorated war veteran himself who sacrificed a leg in the conflict with Germany, the new 46-year-old chief executive was visibly thrilled by the demonstration of both regular army units and national guardsmen. Thunderous applause greete Alabama's Frank Dixon and Bibb Graves, new and retiring governors, respectively, Monday as the inaugural parade swung up historic Dexter Avenue.

Approximately 50,000 lined the streets to see the pageantry. MONTGOMERY, Ala. - Ala hama's new governor, Frank M. Dixon, of Birmingham, Monday demanded a cessation of "attacks or the South" and the removal of "artificial barriers" placed against the South by "partisan politics and sectional interests."

These demands were made in his inaugural address, keynoted with an attack on "discriminations" against the South, before throngs of Alabamians who flocked to the capital for the inaugural Governor Dixon called upon the South for a united Southern voice at the 1940 Democratic convention to remove these "discriminations," pledged himself to increase Alabama's school term, conserve the state's resources, continue a road building program and de-clared for "efficient and economical" government. The Birmingham attorney, who rose to the state's highest office. standing near the spot where Jefferson Davis was sworn in as president of the Confederacy, and placing his hand upon the same Bible used by Davis, swore to "support the constitution of the Unit ed States and the constitution of the State of Alabama."
